Wednesday morning: In the death of Dr. N. T. True at Bethel Tuesday night, Maine loses one of its most eminent teachers and valuable citizens. Nathaniel Tuckerman True was born at Pownal, March 15, 1812. He fitted for college at North Yarmouth Academy, and intered Rosedoin in 1833, but did not graduate in the academical course. As he himself expressed it a few years ago, "From that till the present day I have been a student, with the hope that sometime I may be able to graduate." Later he took a medical course at Brunswick, and received the degree of M. D. in 1846. Dr. True taught the first school in Pownal in 1831, when he first introduced the blackboard and Colburn's arithmetic into the schools that Correspondence of Whig and Courier. Of his native town. Six years ago last January, when Dr. True, though nearly seventy years of age, was still at work in the school room—being then Frincipal of the Academy at Gorham, N. H. A reunion of his former pupils was held in that village. One of the notable features of the occasion was the meeting of the venerable teacher with three generations who had sat under his instructions. The case, State vs. Abner Clement, tried flursday, at Town Hall, before Trial Justice Thomas H. Wentworth, oc supied nearly all day and resulted in the discharge of respondent. WHY.

A prominent holder of life insurance policies in a large company sava concerning life insurance. I like life insurance because it has compelled me to save our money. Always a free livar, earning and receiving a good salary, the end of the year always found me about oven with the world. Some years ago I was induced to take out an enderment policy on my life. I entered into the scheme with some daubts and misgivings as to my ability to meet the premiume, but to my surprise I found to meet the premiume but on my surprise I found to meet my premiume but to my surprise I found to meet my produce approache effort, I was obtained to meet my premiume but to my surprise I found to meet my premiume line better the life insurance for the handsome endowment solley I now hold, now considerably more than half paid up. The money paid for premiums has been actually saved, for from my previous experience I knew my salary would have all been spent in other directions half not directed a part for this purpose '- [Const. A company of our militia was soon on the ground to ail in the defense of the village, and the placky captain and his mensiood by their gains all night, watting for the enemy to superage it was a dismal stormy night, and no doubt our honest farmers and tradesmen, acting the part of soldiers had much trembing of heart and many thoughts of home. In the early morning through a clease fog, the dread-eil vessels hove in sight. Our men fired few younds, when without warting for orders broke and ran away.

Our stoot captain had also opened a raking fire upon the vessels and barges fall of soldiers and nebody knows what deed of valor he might have done, or how much that point perceived the militia runnings away. This sight proved such a damper upon his own courage that he just apiked his gains at fiee to his good vessel, and retreated with the rest. To consumitives, a little flock was in the home. Joseph, the closest of the eight, a lad of sixteen, "full of fight," as soon as he heard of the arrival of the British, ran down the road to the house of our General, and climbed to the house of our General, and climbed to the flat roof to see the "fun" This roof was visible to the enemy at one point, and apyling, probably, the boylsh figure, one fired as they sailed by, but the ball flew harmlessly over his nead, and plowed itself into the high ground in the rear. The young patriot, with the terrible whiz of the missite in his ears, and muttering the cry of his elders, "British dogs," flew from the spot to the shelter of home. After the fight, however, he went back, found and dug up the ball. I can show it to you to-day.

CHAPTER, V.

THE HEAD OF THE ETEMPIAN.

At length the heralds and forgrunners of the royal sun had done their work; and, sanching out the shadows, had caused them to flee away. Then up be came in glory from his ocean bed and flooded the earth with warmth and light, I sat there in the heat and listened to the gentle ispping of the water and watched him rise, till presently the alight drift of the heat brought the old shaped rock or peak at the end of the promentory, which we had we athered with so much peril, between me and the majestic sight and blotted it from my view. I still continued to stare at the rock, however, absently enough, till presently it became edged with the fire of the glowing light behind it, and then I started, as well I might, for I perceived that the top of the peak, which was about eighty feet high by 150 thick at its base, was shaped like a negro's head and fars, on which was stamped a most flendish and terrifying expression. There was no doubt about it; there were the thick lips, the fat cheeks and the squat nose standing out with starting clearness against the flaming background. There, too, was the round skull, washed into shape perhaps by thousands of years of wind and weather, and, to complete the resemblance, there was a scrubby growth of weeds or lichen upon it, which against the sun looked for all the world like the wool on a colossal negro's bead. It certninly was very odd—so odd that now I believe that it is not a mere freak of nature, but agigantic monument, fashioned, like the well known Egyptian Sphinz, by a forgotten people out of a pile of rock that lent itself to their design, perhaps as an emphem of warning and defines to any enumies who nuprocached the harbor. Unfortunatoly we were nover able to ascertain whether or not this was the case, inasmuch as the rock was difficult of jacess both from the land and the water side, and we had other things to attend to. Myself, considering the matter by the light of what we afterward saw, I believe it was fashioned by man, but wheth This disease can be krates gazed upon its dorllish face; and thore I have no doubt it will stand when as many conturies as no numbered between her day and our own are added to the year that bore us to oblivion.

"What do you think of that, Job?" I asked of our creainer, who was sitting on the edge of the bont, trying to get as much sunshine as pessible, and generally looking uncommonly wretched; and I pointed to the fiery, demoniacal head.

"Oh, Lord, sir," answered Job, who now perceived the object for the first time, "I think that the old gentleman must have been sitting for its portrait on them rocks."

I laughed, and the laugh woke up Leo.

"Hello," he said, "what's the matter with me? I am all stiff. Whore is the dhow?"

"You may be thankful that you are not stiffer, my boy," I answered. "The dhow is sunit, and everybody on board her is drowned, with the exception of us four, and your own life was only saved by a miracle," and while Job, now that it was light enough; saarched about in a locker for the brandy, for which Leo asked, I told him the history of our night's adventure.

"Great heavenst" he said, faintly: "and to think that we should had a road them the

By this time the brandy was forthcoming, and we all had a good pull at it, and thankful enough we were for it. Also the sun was beginning to get strength and warmed our chilled bones, for we had been wet through for fivo bours or more.

"Why," said Leo, with a gusp, as he put down the brandy bottle, "there is the head the writing talks of—'the reck shaped like the head of an 'Ethiopian.'"

"Yes," I said, "there if is."

"Well, theu," he answered, "the whole thing is true."

"I don't at all see that that follows," I an-countrainty not, and we saw that the month of the little esturry was here about half a mile across, and that the banks were very marshy, and crowded with crocodies lying about on the mud like logs. About a mile ahead of us, however, was what appeared to be a strip of firm land, and for this we steered. In another market of the hour was areas them.

firm land, and for this we steered. In another quarter of an hour we were there, and making the hoat fast to a beautiful tree with broad shiring leaves, and flowers of the magnelia species, only they were rose colored and not white, which hung over the water, we disenbarked. This done, we undressed, washed ourselves, and spread our clothes and the contents of the boat in the sun to dry, which they quickly did, and then taking shelter from the sun under some trees, we made a

By the time that we had finished our meal our clothes were dry, and tro hastened to get into them, feeling not a little refreshed. Indeed, with the exception of weartness and a few bruises, none of us were the worse for our terrifying adventure, which had been fatal to all our companions. Leo, it is true, had been half drowned, but that is no great matter to a vigorous young athlete of five-and-twenty.

After breakfast we started to look about 100 yards broad by 500 long, bordered on one side by the river and or, the other three by welless, desolate swamps, that strotched as far as the kyle could reach. This strip of land was raiseft about twenty-five feet above the level of the surrounding swamps and the

"This place has been a whart," said Leo, dogmatically.

"Nonsense!" I answered. "Who would be feel enough to build a whart in the middle of these dreadful marshes in a country inhabited by savages, that is, if it is inhabited at all?" "Perhaps it was not always marsh, and perhaps the people were not always marsh, and perhaps the people were not always savage," he said, dryly, looking down the steep bank, for we were standing by like river. "Look there," he went on, pointing to a spot where it hurricans of the previous night had torn up one of the magnelia trees, which had grown on the extreme edge of the bank just where it sloped down to the water, by the roots, that had lifted a large cake of earth with them. "Is not that stone world! If not, it is very like it."

"Nonesise?" I said again, and we clambered down to the spot, and yot between the upturned roots and the bank.

"Well?" he said.

But I did not answer this time. I only whisted! mysterious negro's head and the equality mysterious stone work I made no direct reply.

"A country like Africa," I said, "is sure to be full of the relics of long dead and forgotten civilizations. Nobody knows the age of the Egyptian civilization, and very likely if had offshoots. Then there were the Babylonians, and the Promisions, and the Persians, and all, manner of people, all more or less civilized, to say nothing, of the Jews whom everybody 'wanta' nowadeys. It is possible that they, or any one of them, may have had colonies or trading stations about here. Remember those buried Fersian cities that the consul showed us at Kilwa."

"Quite so," said Leo; "but that is not what you said before."

"Well, what is to be done now!" I asked, turning the conversation.

As an answer was forthcoming we proceeded to the edge of the swamp and looked over it. It was apparently boundless, and yast flocks of every sort of water fow came difficult to see the sky. Now that the sun was gettling high, it draw thin, sickly looking clouds of poisonous vapor from the surface of the marsh and from the scuumy pools of stagnant water.

"Two things are clear to me," I said, ad-stagment water.

"Two things are clear to me," I said, addressing my three computions, who stared at this spectacle in dismay, "first, that we can't go across thore" (I pointed to the swamp), "and, secondly, that if we stop here we shall extend this of force." certainly die of fever."

"That's as clear as a havetack," said Joh certainly die of fever."

"That's as clear as a haystack," said Job.
"Very well, then; there are two alternatives before us. One is to bout ship and try and run for some port in the whalebest, which would be a sufficiently risky proceeding, and the other to sail or row on up the river, and see where we come to."

"I don't know what you are going to do," said Leo, setting his month, "but I am going up that river."

Job turned up the whites of his eyes and groaned, and the Arab murmured "Allah" and groaned also. As for me, I remarked, sweetly, that as we seemed to be between the devil and the deep sea, it did not much unatter where we went. But in reality I was as anxious to proceed as Leo. The colossal negro's head and the stone wharf had excited my curiesity to an extent of which I was sexpetly ashamed, and I was propared to gratify is at any cost. Accordingly, having carefully fitted the mast, restowed the boat, and got out our rifles, we embarked. Fortunately the wind was blowing on shore from the opean so we were able to hoist the sail. Indeed, we afterwarf found out that as a general rule the wind set on shore from day-break for some bours, and off shore again at sunset, and the explanation that I offer of they is that when the leath is cooked by the draught rushes in from the sea, lift the sun has one more heated it through. At least that appeared to be the rule here.

Taking aivantage of the foreoring wind we sailed merrity up the 'tiver for three or four has once more heated it through. At least that appeared to be the rule here.

Taking advantage of the favoring wind we saided morrily up the river for three or four hours. About midday the sun grew intensely but and the stench drawn up by it from the markes which the river drains was something too awful and caused us instantly to swallow precautionary doese of quinne. Bhortly afterward the breeze aided away altogether, and as rowing our heavy boat against stream in the heat was out of the question, we were thankful enough to get under the shade of a group of trees—a species of willow—that grew by the edge of the river, and lie there and gasp till at length the approach of sunset put a period to our miseries. Seeing what appeared to be an openspace of water ahead of us, we determined to row there before settling what to do for the night. Just an we were about to loosen the boat, however, a beautiful water buck, with great horns curving forward and a white stripe across the rump, came down to the river to drink, without perceiving us hidden away within fifty yards under the willows. Leo was the first to eatch sight of it, and being an ardent sportsman, thirsting for the blood of big game, about which he had been dreaming for months, he instantly stiffenied all over and pointed like a seater dog. Seeing what was the matter I handed him his express rifle, at the same time that they happened, "mind you don't the same time taking my own.
"Now, then," I whispered, "mind you don't swered. "We knew this head was here; your father saw it. Very, likely it is not the same head that the writing talks of, or if it is, it proves bothing."

"Missi" ho whispared back, contemptuously; "I could not miss if I tried."

He lifted the rifle, and the roan colored buck, having drunk his fill, raised his head and looked out across the river. He was standing right against the sunset sky on a little eminence of ridge of ground that ran across the swamp, widently a favorite path for game, and there was standing very beautiful about him.

Bang! Away be goes with a mighty bound. Lee has missed him. Bang! right under him again. Now for a shot. I must have one, though he is going like an arrow, and a hundred yards away or more. By, Jove! over and over and over. "Well, I think I've wijed your eye there, Master Loo," I say, struggling against the ungenerous exultation that in such a supreme moment of one's extatence will rise in the best tutored sportsman's breast.
"Confound you, yest" growled Lee; and then, with that quick smile that is one of his charms Highting up his handsome face like a ray of light, "I beg your pardon, old fellow! I congratulate you; it was a levely shot, and mine were vile."

We got out of the beat and ran to the buck, which was shot through the spine and stone head that the writing talks of, or if it is, it proves nothing."

Leo smiled at me in a superior way. "You are an unbelieving Jew, Uncle Horaca," he said. "Those who live will see."

"Exactly so," I answared; "and now perhaps you chear vo that we are drifting across a sand bank into the mouth of the river. Get hold of your ear, Job, and we will row in and see if we can't find a place to land."

The river menth which we were entaring did not appear to be a very wide one, though as yot the long banks of steaming mist that clung about its shores had not litted sufficiently to enable us to see its exact width. There was, as is the case with nearly every east African river, a considerable bur at the mouth, which, no doubt, when the wind is off shore and the tide running out, was absolutely impassable even for a boat drawing only a few inches. But as things were it was manageable enough, and we did not ship a cupful of water. In twenty minutes we were well across it, with but slight assistance from curselves, and being carried by a strong though somewhat variable breeze well up the harbor. By this time the mist was being sacked up by the sun, which was getting uncomfortably hot, and we saw that the mouth of the little estuary was been about half a mile across, and that the banks were

I congraintate you, it was a lovely shot, and mine were vite."

We get out of the beat and ran to the buck, which was shot through the spine and stone dead. It took us a quarter of an hour or more to clean it and cut off as much of the best meat as we could carry, and having packed this away, we had barely light enough to row up Into the lagoon like space into which, there being a hollow in the swamp, the river here expanded. Just as the light vanished we cast anchor about fifty yards from the edge of the lake. We did not dare to go caltore, not knowing it we should find dry ground to camp on, and greatly fearing the poisonous exhalation from the marsh, which we thought we should be free from on the water. So we lighted a lantern and made our evening meal off another potted tongue in the best fashion that we could, and then prepared to go to skeep, only, however, to find that sleep was impossible. For whether they were attracted by the lantern, or by the unaccustomed smell of a white man, for which they had been waiting for the last the more tower out. I know not interest. for which they had been waiting for the last thousand years or so, I know not; but certainly we were presently attacked by tens of thousands of the most bloodthirsty, pertinacious and lugo mosquitoes that I ever saw or read of. In clouds they came and pinged, and buzzed, and bit till we were nearly mud. Tobacce snoke only seemed to sit them into a merrier and more active life, till at length we were driven to covering ourselves with blankets, head and all, and sitting to slowly stew and continually scratch and swear beneath them. And as we ast, suddenly rolling out like thunder through the silence came the deep rear af a lion, and then of a second lion, moving among the reeds within lifty yards of us. for which they had been waiting for the last

"I say," said Lee, sticking his head out from "I say," and Lee, sticking his head out from under his blanket, "lacky we mint on the bank, ch. Avuncular?" (Lee semetimes addressed me in this disrespectful way.) "Curse ith a mosquite has bitten mu on the nosa," and the head vanished again.

Shortly after this the mean came up, and

Shortly after this the moon came up, and notwithstanding overy variety of roar that echoed over the water to us from the lions on the bank we began, thinking ourselves perfectly secure, to doze off.

I don't quite knew what it was that made me poke my head out of the friendly shelter of the blanket—perhaps because I found that the mesquitoes were biting right through it. Anyhow as I did so I heard Job whisper, in a frightened voice, "Oh, my stars, look there?" Instantly we all of us looked, and this we make we saw in the mocallight. Near the shore were two wide and ever widening circles of concortro irings rippling away across the surface of the water, and in the heart and center of the circles were two dark moving objects.

"Allah!" thouted Mahomed. "A crocodile has got him by the leg." And sure enough he had. We could see the long amout with its gloaming lines of teeth and, the reptile body And then followed a scene that absolutely behind it.

And then followed a scene that absolutely biffles description. The lim managed to get well on to the bank, this crocodile, half standing and half awimming, still nipping his hind leg. He reared till the air-quivered with the sound, and then, with a savage, shricking snarl, turned round and clawed hold of the ercocodile's head. The crocodile shifted his grip, having as we afterward discovered, had one of his eyes torn out, and turned slightly over, and instantity the lim got him by the throat and held on, and then over and over they rolled upon the bank, struggling hideously. It was impossible to follow their movements, but when next we got a clear view the tables had turned; for the crocodile, whose head seemed to be a mass of gore, had got the hior's body in his iron jaws just above the hips, and was squeezing him and shaking him to and fro. For his part the tortured brate, rearing in agony, was clawing and biting madily at his enemy's scaly head, and firing his great hind claws in the crocodile's, comparatively speaking, soft throat, ripping it paratively speaking, soft threat, ripping it open as one would rip a glove. Then all of a sudden the end came. The Hon's head fell forward on the crocodile's Hon's head felt forward on the erocodile's back, and with an awful groan he died; and the croeodile, after standing for a minute motionless, dowly rolled ever on to his side, his jawes still fixed across the carcass of the lion, which we afterward found to luid bitten almost in half.

This duel to the death was a wonderful and a shocking sight, and one that I suppose few men have seen, and thus it ended.

When it was all over, leaving Mahomed to keep a look out, we managed to spend the rest of the night as quietly as the mosquitoes would lot us.

Resolutions of Respect.

Whereas, The angel of death has visited for the first time Riverside Grange, No. 273, anexpected, unannounced, surprising us by ts presence, startling us by the choice of its victim. Its sad mission was to summon our worthy and esteemed sister, Hittle C. Gilmore, from time to eternity. So suddenly did the call come for such a friend and Patron, that in our lients we asked, Can this be true, and why this affletion? But mindful of the fact that it was our Fat ier's hand that did it, we how our heads in silence to the blow.

blow, Resolved, That in the death of Sister Gilmore we have met with an irreparable loss. A true friend and Christian, an earnest Patron, a devoted wife and mother, carnest Patron, a devoted wife and mother, has been taken from our unidst. While we mourn our own loss we paiso remember the deeper sorrow of our worthy brother, who so devotedly and anxiously watched his suffering, wife, hoping she might be spared to him and his family of seven children.

Resolved. That Brothers and Sisters of Riverside Grange extend to Brother Gilmore their succers and heartfelt sympathy in this his great affliction, assuring him that friendly hearts beat in accord with his, and who, while life remains, will ever hold in memory the name of his beloved wife,

Milesolved, Illint as a token of respect of our departed sister the charter of the Grange be draped in mourning, and each member wear the usual badge of mourning for thirty days,

Resolved, That a copy be placed upon our records, a page being devoted to that purpose, a copy be presented to the family of the deceased, and a copy sent to the BANGOR WEEKLY COURTER for publication.
